The Other Davidson

Until we began our series on The Other Davidson, which began last week, we at Davidson News were unaware of many if not most Davidson students who are unmarried, and of their experiences, needs and opinions. It is, however, a world of which we are only now beginning to realize the size.

But regardless of whether or not you want the world of one student population to be another, the world of unmarried students at Davidson is very real, and it’s high time we began to examine it.

As the articles pointed out, Davidson students, and especially as they stand separate from a railroad track segment its reality. Neither side really understands the other, but each assumes it knows the other’s viewpoint, without understanding, custom and personal experiences of the whole relationship.

The college employs most of the residents of The Other Davidson, and just in the last few years the college administration has taken a more interest of The Other Davidson, and with a genuine promise of more attention.

The housing situation in The Other Davidson has been a little more complex than one might think. Last September a housing project was being built for the students, and it was completed 20 new houses so far at a rather spotty, but the influx of several industries helping the college administration to understand the situation.

And where there has been mistrust and misunderstanding between the two communities, a Mayor’s Committee has recently been formed and has taken steps to further the understanding and appreciation of each other’s viewpoints, and what The Other Davidson is all about. They have both been a number of meetings at the college, and at The Other Davidson.

Graduate Schools Facing Draft Quota Difficulties

By College Press Service

Although the nation’s great state universities did not favor the 10 percent reduction in fall enrollments which obtained last year because of the draft, the second term may be much harder to fill this year

"Only 20 universities, which had accepted many graduate students, were affected by the 10 percent reduction in fall enrollments last year because of the draft," said Edward White, director of admissions of the University of Pennsylvania, "but this year the reduction will be as high as 30 percent for many schools."

"The schools that will be affected this year are the ones that did not take as much of a hit last year." The schools are the great research universities, those that attract the best and brightest of the nation’s college graduates. And these schools are the ones that expect to take the greatest hit this year, when 170 universities were affected by the 10 percent reduction last year.

"The schools that were not affected last year, such as those in the east and west, will again be unaffected this year," White said. "But those in the south and midwest will take a much greater hit this year."

The schools that expect to take the greatest hit this year are:

- Harvard University, which expects to lose 1,500 students
- Columbia University, which expects to lose 1,200 students
- Stanford University, which expects to lose 1,000 students
- Yale University, which expects to lose 1,000 students
- The University of California, which expects to lose 1,000 students

"These schools will have to make do with the students they do have," White said. "They will have to make do with the students they have, but they will have to do it with a much smaller pool of students."
College Offers Some Advantages, But Marrieds Exist Outside It

By JOHN WILLIAMS

Amidst the commotion and excitement surrounding the university, there is a notable group of students who have chosen a different path. This group consists of students who have married and are attending college, known as "married students." These students face unique challenges and advantages in their academic pursuits.

The married students, like any other student, have the opportunity to pursue their education and careers, but they also have responsibilities outside of their studies. This includes managing a household, raising children, and fulfilling other family obligations.

The university offers resources to support married students, such as counseling services and programs designed to help them balance their academic and personal lives. These resources are important in ensuring that married students are able to succeed in their studies.

Despite the challenges, married students bring valuable perspectives and experiences to the college community. Their experiences can enrich the educational environment for all students, and they add to the diversity of the student body.

Ultimately, the university recognizes the importance of supporting married students and is committed to providing the necessary resources and support to help them succeed in their academic and personal pursuits.

The Davidson College basketball season has come to a conclusion in some ways, a beginning in others. The players of the basketball team have graduated, and it may be a long time before they set foot again in the Davidson College Coliseum. New players have taken their place, and the basketball team has become a new entity...the Southern Conference basketball team.

The basketball team was the same last year, but this season the coach was different. The results were different, and the outcome of the season was better. The Southern Conference basketball team was a success.

It is so difficult to know what to say about the Davidson basketball team. The players had a great season, and the coaches were able to guide them to victory in many games. The Southern Conference basketball season was a time for change.

Jackson's Show Provides Zebras, Shocks, Sex, Bars

After years of complaints, both public and private, of the poor service, a report has finally been taken of Navy’s food service.

A committee, chaired by Union Board members Clay Edwards and including Tom Allen, has completed a study of the food service. The report includes a survey of student opinions and a review of the contracts with vendors.

Food Service Critique Suggests Improvements

Jackson was once again and decided they probably are both right.

Despite my disdain for the overly cute quality of several Union Board meetings, the comp_any program has continued to grow. The percentage of opportunities has declined over the last year, but the Board of Trustees remains committed to offering a diverse and uplifting program for the students. A new committee was appointed to take on the Board's recommendation for a possible voluntary program from the Student Senate.

The opportunity offered students in the past to explore new ideas, experience new opportunities, and receive help. It has been the case that only half credit. The credit for the advanced placement program is offered to any student who wishes to take ROTC and the credit is offered to those who wish to use the opportunity offered.

The policy, which is actually a hybrid ROTC and National Guard program, was also changed. The policy is now used to allow principals to lead the program's decision-making, and to allow students to volunteer for ROTC.

The policy was first adopted by the Union Board in 1957, and was later revised by the Student Senate. The policy is now used to allow students to volunteer for ROTC and to allow principals to lead the program's decision-making.
